Attendance Policy Debated

Attendance is an important part of making grades at Glenville State College due to the fact that the college enforces an attendance policy that is very strict and outdated. Granted, attendance is an important part of making good grades but aren't students in college mature enough and responsible enough to know if they need to attend class often or if they seldom need to attend class? We feel that they are quite capable of making the decision. Most professors on campus tend to abide by Glenville State College's attendance policy which states that "when the number of hours of unexcused absences exceeds the number of credit hours the instructor is to inform the student in writing that irregular attendance is endangering the student's classwork" and if the student misses after this notice, he is suspended from class.

However, the policy also states that professors who do not desire to abide by this policy may form their own policy and present it to their students in writing. Unfortunately, only a few professors on campus choose to do so, and those who do should be commended for taking the time to produce a more reasonable attendance policy.

Why is it that Glenville State College is so far behind? Not only is the attendance policy outdated, but there are other matters on this campus that need to be revised and nothing is being done to change them. It seems that a college would want to grow and change with the times. Most of the other institutions in West Virginia do not have attendance policies. Those that do are not as strict as Glenville State College. West Virginia University is one example of an institution that does not have a general attendance policy for professors to enforce and students to endure.

Come on Glenville State College - the only way to keep up with other institutions and to prosper is to expand and do away with old policies and old ways in general. Unless an attempt is made to change this policy, as well as other matters on this campus, Glenville will only continue to become further and further behind. As an old wise philosopher once said, 'Glenville is so far behind, that they think they are ahead!' Samples Conducts Study

According to a recent study conducted by Mack Samples, Dean of Records and Admissions, with the help of the Computer Center, freshmen who live on campus in one of the residence halls perform better academically than those who live off campus. Students who had completed fewer than 27 hours at the end of the fall 1984 semester were the subjects of the study.

Those students who lived in the residence halls showed an overall cumulative average of 2.7084 while those who lived off campus could only muster a 2.0704. While there are several relative factors that must be considered in such a study, the vast difference in the two averages lead to the conclusion that residence hall freshmen do indeed perform better academically.

"I would have guessed the opposite," Samples said. "One tends to think that those freshman who live at home would do better because of parental pressure to study."

No distinction was made between full and part time, nor between on campus and extension students. "I would not say that this was a conclusive study, and I would not want to publish the results in a national journal," said Samples, "but it does provide us with some interesting thoughts here in Glenville."

There will be a meeting of 4-H members and persons interested in joining 4-H on Thursday, March 21 at 5 p.m. in the Wesley Foundation.
